 (54) ADSL (Alerting Device to save Life).
 (57) The functionality of the ADSL is made possible by programming a microcontroller to output a warning message to the driver or machine operator whenever the driver approaches a road sign or another vehicle or person in the case of the machine operator. Road sign detection, Heavy Mobile Equipment to light-vehicle recognition, Locomotive to personnel recognition, and mobile vehicle to motorcycle/bicycle alerting is achieved by equipping the ADSL module with a radio transmitter/receiver (transceiver) device that allows it to send and receive signals and allow for communication between two vehicles. The module is designed to work in any road transportation device such as cars and motorcycles. It is also designed to work in heavy machines by carefully equipping it with its power supply circuitry that allows it to tap electrical energy from the car or machine without overloading it. The ADSL is also equipped with a power amplification circuit and thus it can be connected to an external speaker to output sound. The radius of communication has been carefully programmed to give a speeding driver enough time to react before hitting an object or missing a road sign. Hence, it is a proactive approach to mitigating road traffic and mine accidents that are caused by this nature.

 (74) Dench Intellectual Property Consultants, Private/Bag E891, P.O. Box 5, Lusaka, Zambia.
 (57) The invention relates to a new way of reducing dissolved metals, in particular Cu+2 to Cu, in which the effect of the diffusion-limiting layer is regulated, optimising the variables which determine the mobilisation of the metal ion (Cu +2) towards the cathode and the thermodynamic stability of the reduction reaction of Cu +2 to Cu? (or metal of interest) on the cathodic surface. The process is carried out by controlling a dimensionless ratio (referred to as ~) or the cathodic polarisation, within certain predefined margins, dynamically adjusting concentrations, flows and/or electrical currents to maintain the predefined operating conditions at an optimum level.
